independently and probably knows more about where he is and what he is than I do.

"My relations with Coroner Nugent have been wrongly represented. Over the telephone he told me he had not heard from Louis, and I told him that he probably would before the day was over. I had understood that Louis would be the Coroner's hang from him. I did not promise to produce him. I have not heard from him directly and I do not know where he is."

William E. Everett, young Disbrow's father-in-law, was seen at his home in Jamaica to-day and said:

"We have not seen Louis Disbrow for several months. And we have no desire to see him. While divorce proceedings had been contemplated they had not been started. My daughter was waiting for more evidence, which was accumulating. It is the impression that she fell into the waters of the bay while trying to drag Foster into the boat.

"As to now Foster went overboard there is a diversity of opinion. Some believe the story of the wandering bagman who says he saw a man in a boat strike another man in another boat on the head with an oar and saw the man struck go over the side.

"Others incline to the theory that Foster was intoxicated and fell out of the boat and that the girl, in an effort to help him back, capsize the crazy little craft.

"At any rate, public opinion has settled that the girl died for love of the man who was drowned with her. She might have saved herself. It is thought, had she permitted Foster to drown. While she could swim, she must have known that to attempt to save her lover was sacrificing herself.

"In this connection there is a story current that Louis Disbrow had agreed with his wife that she was to secure a divorce. This accomplished, according to the current rumor, he was to have married Miss Lawrence. Then the girl became infatuated with Foster and the plan was spoiled. Those who believe the story of the assault on Foster by another man in another boat quote the Disbrow plan in support of their theory.
